Drizly is an online delivery service that delivers beer, wine and liquor delivered directly to their homes. As you can imagine, it's quite popular with customers. But, it's also a hit with freelancers and liquor retailers. But unlike most app delivery companies, Drizly does not hire contractors to complete deliveries. Instead, Drizely plays the middleman. The Drizly platform simply connects customers with alcohol retailers. The platform allows customers to place orders and retailers to receive orders, but they don't actually make deliveries. Employees hired by the liquor store actually make deliveries. Sense? Ok. If you want to make a few extra bucks at night, this can be a good way to do it. How much do Drizly drivers do? Well, the answer to that question is different. As with most job-based gigs, the delivery driver's salary depends on a number of different factors. Below we will discuss how drivers pay, how much they make, and how you can sign up to deliver for Drizly. We'll even offer some tips to help you increase your income once you're at work. Look: How much can you do as a Drizly driver? Here's the thing: This app is a little different from DoorDash and Postmates. If you've ever worked for these companies in the past, it's important to know that Drizly works a little differently. You can imagine that there are some pretty tough laws around the distribution of alcohol. As a result, Drizly has to be careful about who they hire. It's not as easy as just login, fill out an application and take orders as you would with UberEats. Instead, you should get hired by an actual liquor store, not Drizly yourself. In fact, it means two things: you only work in one store at a time: unlike UberEats, Doordash or Grubhub, you won't spend your shift driving from store to store picking up orders. Instead, you will work exclusively for one store during your change the wine shop owner determines your income: there are no set Drizly wages. It is entirely up to the store or the subcontractor who works with Drizly to determine the driver's rates. This makes the job more like being a pizza delivery driver for one chain. According to our research, most drivers make between $12 and $13/hour. However, this figure includes tips, meaning that some drivers do just as much as the minimum wage. Ultimately, the salary of a Drizly driver depends on who they work for, where they work, and how busy they are. Schedule. What one driver does in Boston may be less or more than drivers in Denver or Chicago. Obviously, drivers who work during rush hour (nights, weekends, Super Bowls, etc.) can expect to do more. But since it's a freelance concert, it's hard to predict exactly what someone will do as a driver. Before you go straight to and works for a company that researches wages at a local store. Find out if it's financially worth working with them. Tips All for Drizly Drivers It's freelance work. Remember that when you work as an independent contractor, you are not guaranteed hourly wages just like other full-time (or even part-time) employees. For example, if a store promises you $12/hour, it doesn't necessarily mean that your hourly wage will be $12. Instead, it could mean that your total income (including tips) will be equal to $12/hour at the end of the week. To illustrate this idea, here's a Glassdoor comment from one (slightly disgruntled) former Drizly employee: In other words, if you work an 8-hour shift one day but only make $60, the employer can expect to exceed your salary from a better day to your weekly salary. Thus, the ultimate goal is to earn at least a base rate for every hour at work. If your base salary is $12/hour and you do it consistently, you don't have to worry about managers and subcontractors finagling to pay around so that they technically keep their promise. How do you do that? Well, earning tips. These are payments that will help you earn more than the minimum. Fortunately, Drizly very well encourages its customers to give advice. Their app's payment feature offers customers the opportunity to tip their driver. It is set at 10% by default, but customers have the option to increase or decrease the amount as they see fit. The good thing is that Drizly has a $20 minimum policy. Customers cannot place an order if they buy at least $20 worth of alcohol. Ultimately, this means that at a minimum, you will earn a $2 tip. And if the customer includes a $5 shipping fee as part of their account, they will tip you at least $2.50. Drizly also allows customers to change their tips at a later date by contacting the customer support team. If the customer feels that they have given you insufficient advice when disembarking, they may contact the company to give you some more money later. How to become a Drizly driver? Does driving around in your car delivering alcohol sounds like a good way to make some extra cash? Ready to come to work? There are two ways to become a driver: 1. Apply with a Drizly partner in your area Drizly has a database of affiliate stores on its website. You can apply by finding a store in your area and calling the store directly. Use the search feature on your homepage to find the store closest to you. 2. Apply through Drizly's Driver Job Board When you apply directly through Drizly, they will send your application to all local partners in your area. This is because it saves you trouble having to call all retailers yourself. If the retailer has Drizly jobs, they will contact you directly. Each alcohol retailer has a different process of hiring contractors. If you are applying through Drizly or directly to the store, you need to go through through a specific hiring process. Depending on the store, this can include any number of checks, scans of driving history, and interviews. As you earn more money as Drizly Driver As we pointed out above, it can be hard to make a lot of money as a freelance delivery driver, especially if you run on a slow day. But, there are a few key tactics you can use to boost your earnings. Each of these tips will help you put a little more cash in your pocket. Check them out: Drive a fuel-efficient car Nothing is more distressing than seeing a freelance delivery driver drive up in an SUV. It's like... What are you? Do you realize how much gas you're wasting? To work as a deliveryman and actually get away with the money in your wallet at the end of the night, you need to cut gas costs. We know it's hard. Most people can't afford to just go out and buy a new car for their work. But the vehicle can really make or break your income when it comes to working as an on-demand driver. So drive a Camry, Sonata, or some other small sedan if possible. Your salary will thank you. And if you're stuck with the F250, this may not be the best job for you. Work in your area, even if you have an economical car, you will spend a lot of money on gas if you have to drive 5 miles to get to the liquor store. After all, 10 miles adds up if you do it every day. The closer you work to home, the more money you will save on gasoline. You know the streets of your neighborhood, but use the display app anyway. Google Maps or Waze help you avoid wasting gas by routing you around hiccups during rush hour. Of course, if the liquor store in your area doesn't get a lot of business, it might make sense to go to the next city to work for another. But, make sure the store is jam-packed with orders before you commit driving there several times a week. Bring your bike There is no policy that says you can't deliver by bike. We believe it is up to the store owner to decide whether this is a good thing. However, it is likely that there are some orders that do not require a car. For example, if someone half a mile from the store orders two bottles of wine, you may not go there. Instead, it would probably be better to have a bike on hand. So you can just throw the bottles into your basket or backpack and pedal on over to their house. Of course, there are definitely some orders that require a car (no one wants to deliver kegs on a bike). So you're going to want to move out. But, bringing your bike in the trunk or rooftop rack can help you save cash. Keep track of your expenses of the benefits of freelancing is that you can write off business expenses on taxes. You can write off everything you spend money on in order to earn income as an independent contractor. All this fuel, maintenance, and even these car washes are deducted. This means that You don't have to pay income tax on the money you spend on these things. But, you have to keep track of your receipts. So you can hand them over to the accountant (or count them yourself) at the end of the year. And, you can show them to the IRS if they ever want to see them. Remember that gas is expensive. Car maintenance too. By subtracting these costs from your income, you will save a lot of money on the bottom line. Working with another alcohol delivery company, Drizly, is currently available in 101 cities in the United States and North America. Although it's a pretty big market, it doesn't cover everyone. At the same time, Drizly is not the only alcohol delivery service out there. They currently have several major competitors: Saucey, Swill and Minibar. Postmates also offers the delivery of alcohol, including beer, wine and liquor in some markets. It is possible that Drizly may not be the most popular service in your area. You may find that one of their competitors has a hold on the stores in your area. Before you sign up, then, you can shop around to see which is the most popular service in your city. This can help keep you busy, earn tips, and avoid slow days. Drizly: Alternative to Rideshares and Food Delivery Other companies such as Uber eats and food delivery apps such as Doordash have been great opportunities for many people. But these aren't the only options out there. The Drizly model with one partner seems like it can prevent some people from making a lot of money. But there are actually a few advantages. First of all, it offers security that many concerts based on jobs are lacking. Working exclusively with one store, Drizly contractors can get their schedules in advance. Even though you don't always know how much you'll earn, you'll be able to plan your hours in advance. Also, you don't have to worry about competing with other contractors for the job. UberEats feels like a constant race for the best jobs. On the other hand, on the other hand, it minimizes competition by hiring only the number of workers they need. After all, it makes it a little easier to get a permanent job. Assuming you'll go the extra mile to earn tips, this steady schedule can help you earn a decent income as a driver. Driver.
